The Razer Huntsman V2 keyboard floats within a large industrial hangar.

As the hangar doors shut close, the space becomes shrouded in darkness, highlighting the keyboard's Razer Chroma RGB lighting for a brief moment.

Large florescent lights within the hangar turn on and begin to flicker between 2 different colors: red and purple.

We cut between close ups of the keyboard's red and purple optical switches actuating furiously.

Red lasers fan out from the ceiling of the hangar, encircling the switches.

We cut to a closeup of the purple switches actuating in sync to the music with loud, satisfying clicks.

The camera flips upside down to reveal a close up of the red switches actuating in sync to the music. Compared to the purple switches, these sound deeper and smoother.

The camera flips again and we see the keyboard being dropped into an acoustic test chamber that is lined with foam.

As the corner of the keyboard comes into contact with the foam, the keyboard itself disappears, leaving only a layer of sound dampening foam that bounces up into the air.

A series of loud, hollow clicks are heard in comparison, before the keyboard materializes around the foam and we hear its true sound profile: deep, smooth, and full.

We cut to single keycap behind a glass display, being subjected to a series of durability tests.

The camera transitions to series of buttons and dials at the top right of the keyboard. Graphical overlays appear across them, highlighting the various commands they can be mapped to.

We cut to a metal sphere rolling along the keyboard's padded wrist rest, highlighting the cushion's plush texture.

As the metal sphere rolls off, the wrist rest slowly glides towards the keyboard and locks in place, causing all the switches to actuate furiously.
